15:00:00 15/11/2017

I know nobody wants this to be true, but folks, I really actually am dying. Let's talk about what's going on.

Today we met with Dr. Marzban, aka @bestdocover. I wore this shirt.

It's World Cancer Day today and how fitting is it that I am in hospital dealing with this wretched disease... at least, trying to deal with it.

I was going to get on the bandwagon and put my own version of Beyoncé's pregnancy announcement, but I have chickened out and you only get the boring/disgusting photo – my pregnancy photo - beautiful oversized and fluid filled abdomen, with my amazing ever-growing bruise, topped off with a colostomy bag to catch the fluid that dribbles out. This is horrible to my babies. My tumours.

As you know, I came into hospital last Friday night because I wasn't able to manage my pain from home. In the last few months my lesions have grown dramatically. One in particular that sits at the top of my abdomen in an area called the porto hepatis. It is pushing on some pretty crucial structures and causing a truckload of pain.

When admitted, we discovered that I had a build-up of fluid on my abdomen – I looked like I was at the end stages of pregnancy. After a botched attempt, they managed to drain 2 litres of fluid on Monday and have had another 2 litres drained today. They will continue to drain 2 litres daily as

I still remember typing the inaugural post on November 25, 2015. That was the day I first discovered a suspicious lump on the right side of my neck. In many ways, it feels like yesterday. In other ways, it seems so very long ago.

At the time, I opted to start blogging versus keeping a private journal about my experience with Stage IV oropharyngeal cancer after being formally diagnosed in December 2015. Beyond finding writing cathartic, blogging allowed me to efficiently keep family and

Ringen um spirituelle / religiöse Orientierung

Es ist nicht möglich, sich angesichts des Todes nicht mit Glaubensfragen (...) auseinanderzusetzen. Ich frage mich, ob die Ärzte hier deshalb nicht mit ihren Patienten über den Tod sprechen wollen, weil die moderne westliche Medizin so strikt wissenschaftlich und säkular ausgeübt wird.»
